Numerical data, quantitative literacy, and empirical reasoning are increasingly important for students to enhance critical thinking about the world around them. BCRW is excited to launch three new courses this spring. Join us for these Lunchtime Lectures as we explore strategies for integrating empirical reasoning into their history to computer science courses? Heather Van Volkinburg, Associate Professor in the Department of History, will explain how that increasingly relies on empirical data. In this lecture, we will look at the role that statistical methods and empirical reasoning will need in an evolving landscape.

NOTE

SCATTERED HEGEMONIES: POSTMODERNITY AND TRANSNATIONAL FEMINIST PRACTICES
Catherine Sameh, Ph.D.

Twenty years ago, Inderpal Grewal and Caren Kaplan made a major contribution to our understanding of the intersections of race, empire, neoliberalism, accessibility, militarization, religion, secularism, sexual politics, and social movements, and how together they have shaped our world. In the past four years, BCRW has built our own transnational feminisms project under the leadership of Janet Jakobsen and Catherine Sameh, with an aim to transnational feminist movements with their anthology, Scattered Hegemonies: Postmodernity and Transnational Feminist Practices, and the current questions that animate our interdisciplinary approach.

In the past four years, BCRW has welcomed scholars and activists to campus from countries including South Africa, India, and Pakistan, and have spearheaded transnational seminars in Mumbai and Cape Town. This spring, we hope you will join us.

And of course, there's so much more—as always, please check our website, bcrw.barnard.edu, for the latest updates.

We hope you will join us.
